AS TO HAIRDRESSING.

Women in Spain Know Well How Tend Their Locks-Straight Hair and Cowardice.

From the New York Tribune.
Throughout Spain the traveler is struck with the exceeding neatness and daintiness with the exceeding heathess and shown by women in the arrangement of their hair. The lower classes wear no hats, and the hair is always beautifully dressed. Different styles are adopted, but the inclination is to mass the tresses on the top of the head. There is no unkempt look; each lock lies in place, and the whole bears evidence of having been combed and brush-ed to the last degree. Somewhere under braid or coil a flower will be tucked, even the small girls wearing this adornment. The ancients attributed a great deal of importance to the hair. Lank hair they thought was indicative of pusilianimity and cowardice, yet Napoleon had never a curl. Frizzy hair was a sign of coarseness and clumsiness. Ringlets had the place of honor.

clumsiness. Ringlets had the place of honor.

Achilles and Ajax Telamon had curling locks, as had Timon the Athenian. The Emperor Augustus had such ringlets that no hairdresser in Rome could produce the like. Auburn or light brown hair was considered the most distinguished, as portending intelligence, industry, a peaceful disposition and a loving nature. Black hair was not esteemed by the Romans and red was an object of aversion. The "hair of a dissembling color," to which Shakespeare refers, was red, so-called from the notion that Judas had red hair.

But ages before the time of Judas red hair was held in disrepute, both in the case of Typhon, who deprived his brother of the scepter of Egypt, and Nebuchadnezzar, who acquired it in the explation of his atrocities, This hatred of red hair even extended to the donkey tribe.

The ancient Hebrews esteemed fine hair a great beauty, and haldness the sign of the anger of God. Artificial hair was used in the earliest days by the Greeks and Romans.

"When you see fair hair be pitiful," in the earnest days by the Greek and Romans, "When you see fair hair be pitiful," writes George Eliot. In the time of Ovid. blonde hair was extremely fashionable, and those Roman women who did not wear wigs and yet wished to conform to the fashion powdered their hair with a preparation of gold dust. The art of dyeing the hair is ascribed to Medea. "Fair tresses Man's imperial race ensuare, And beauty draws us with a single hair."

MODES OF THE NEW SEASON. What Our Leaders of Fashion Will Wear This Autumn-Parisian Coats. Coat bodices differing from the skirt are now being worn, or the coat and skirt correspond and there are revers, vest and center skirt panel of different material. The center skirt panel of different material. The cloth coat and plaid skirt make an undoubtedly chic combination and many serges and self-colored skirts have plaid linings, the plaid showing again as vest or yoke and in the hat. A costume of this type, with cape lined plaid to match, makes a charming costume for country or seaside wear and both cape and hat are useful with other gowns.

a charming costume for country or seasine wear and both cape and hat are useful with other gowns.

If Parisian styles catch on here this winter coats will be very diversified and those for late autumn wear have rounded fronts and long tails, the front shorter and giving the pouched effect, although not actually full, but standing out either with trimmings or revers. Many of the coats with very tiny basques have longer fronts, falling straight and we shall probably see the smarter coats trimmed with frills, as these are already shown in Paris.

The fashion of tightly-fitted parts and deep flounces on skirts admits of much variation, and one notable model had the yoke and upper portion of the skirt of blue silk, with a dainty little pattern in blue and shaped flounce were of plain blue silk trimmed with black ruchings. Another gown of grenadine over white glace silk had an aintegrately notered.

trimmed with black ruchings. Another gown of grenadine over white glace slik had an elaborately patterned flounce, yoke and epaulettes, the rest of the gown of plain grenadine, with ruches of lace.

Gowns for evening wear are made on a foundation of slik and satin, this only covered in parts, such as a deep flounce of muslin or lisse put on to leave a pointed apron of slik at back and front, the flounce full and headed with a ruche. Overskirts and draperies are becoming general on the light fussy type of gown, and we shall no doubt see them generally adopted for evening wear during the winter.

Oranges in French Style. What we serve at table is by no means entirely the important point; how we serve is almost equally to be considered. Oranges in French style, for instance, make a decorative dish with little additional trouble, and a mold of rice Bavarian cream also adds attraction to the board. The Boston Cooking School Magazine tells how to prepare both of these and illustrates the former.

Cooking School Magazine tells how to prepare both of these and illustrates the former.

Select six oranges having fine skins. Cut away one-third from the end of each orange then with a spoon remove all the pulp. Of the large hemispheres cut the edge in small vandykes and punch circles below the polnts or make other decorations. Put the skins thus ornamented in cold water until ready to serve. Press the juice from the pulp, using for this purpose a vegetable press, ricer or a piece of cheesecoth. There should be one pint of juice. Add the juice of two lemons and one cup of sugar. Have ready half a box of gelatine (about two tablespoonfuls of granulated gelatine) soaked in a cup of cold water and dissolved in a cup of bolling water. Strain the gelatine into the orange juice; stir until the sugar is dissolved, then set away to become chilled. When ready to serve, arrange the "shells" on a dish covered with green leaves, or arrange on individual plates. Fill them with the jelly, cut in cubes, and decorate with whipped cream, pressed through a pastry bag or tube, and candied cherries. The dish is very handsome when the juice of the Maltese oranges is used in the lemon jelly and whipped cream or with preserved or canned fruit.

Children and Water.

Children and Water.

Most children like to play in the water, and it is quite an art to teach them to do so without getting wet. It is not the getting wet which does harm, but the remaining so, and clothes may be changed. Sailing boats in the bathtub and blowing bubbles may be carefully done, and when too many children do not participate in the frolic the players can keep themselves dry. Exact that when one gets wet the amusement that when one gets wet the amusement must stop at once. There was once a sensible mother whose small boy found in the hydrant, as so many small boys do, a magnet whose attractions no punishment could outweigh. She made him a water-proof garment—a sort of overall with sleeves—bought him rubber boots, and, thus protected, let him play in the water, only insisting that he must put on his waterproof before going near the hydrant. No colds were taken and no harm done thereafter, while watering the flowers and the grass plot became one of that small boy's best beloved occupations. Constant repression is productive of more harm than good, "Hush" and "Stop" may be said from one day's end to another and produce nothing but ill temper. The true secret of success in managing children is to teach them to occupy themselves pleashat when one gets wet the amusement

The young woman's hosfor patients too ill to run around. Miss Shaw thinks that women are admirably adapted to this work, as they are more tender by nature than men, and the animals appreciate their gentle care just as much as men do.

Separate guimpes, with sleeves of very finely tucked lawn organdie, batiste, with or without lace insertion, are quite the smartest accessories to the charming new figured foulard gowns. Liberty silk is puffed and ruched into pretty guimpes.

The Cuban Waltz. To see a half dozen Cuban men and women at their best it is to see them dancing the Cuban waltz at one of those small social gatherings at a friend's house which occupy in so quiet and sensible a fashion the evenings of many Spanish-speaking people in both hemispheres. The dance is expressive: it has dignity: it is graceful, is poetic and is instinct with the dance is expressive the character.

Such indolent, phantom-like dancing never before was seen. The couples turn very little and the soles of their feet scarcely stir from the floor. It is the conventional waltz step reduced to the last pitch of deliberate languor. Slowly they revolve together, slipping insensibly round the room. There seems to be no reason why waltzing taken at such a gait as this should not go on forever. At a given moment four couples find themselves opposite each other and form a quadrille, the round dance thus merging temporarily into a square one. The white dresses of the women sweep to and fro with a dignified disregard of haste, and their plumply rounded arms are extended in a graceful chain. Then they break softly away and return to their partners and the waltz is resumed.

That "old reliable," the theater waist, has bobbed up serenely again and in love-ly guise. It comes low-necked and short-sleeved, or very high in the throat and long in the sleeve, but, as ever, to be worn with some serviceable dark skirt. One of the prettlest seen this early was a dinner blouse of pleated lilac chiffon, cut out square over the shoulders and trimmed with bands of ivory white lace sparkling with colored beads. It was a simple, charming confection whipped up by an amateur hand. All the blouses are made to fit over the skirt belt, and a good deal of ingenuity is exercised, therefore, in the making of novel girdles. Slender women wear pretty pointed boned waist bands that lace up on either hip, and the method is to fold a broad Liberty satin ribbon in close folds about the waist and knot it a little to one side in an open rosette with wired edge. Sometimes one large and two small rosettes are set at the fustening point, and when a bright satin is used the effect is that of wearing a knot of quaint flowers. long in the sleeve, but, as ever, to be worn

To Make a Diamond Crown. From the New York Herald.

Pretty and agreeable amusement is the production of a perfect imitation of a diamond crown by means of a cheap chemical solution. It is only necessary to dissolve a pound of aium in a quart of hot water and hang in this solution a crown made of wire, wound with flannel.

In order to achieve the best resuls, a smooth surface and perfectly transparent glass should be used, and this, with the solution and the crown, be allowed to stand undisturbed for twenty-four hours. The alum will then have been deposited in crystals on the crown, giving the latter the appearance of a diamond studded crown, which can be taken out of the solution, one can select any other shape, which can be made with wire, and one can color the crystals by pouring a little ink of whatsoever tint into the solution of alum. from the New York Herald.

Silver bowls are not usually plentiful. Silver bowls are not usually plentiful, but one of these glittering heirlooms is a charming receptacle for flowers—especially for the fashionable moss-rose buds lately brought to light again from the back stairs of time. The sheen of the burnished silver is like the glitter of cut glass, and the soft gray tone shows the beauty of the green and rosy buds to great advantage, says Harper's Bazar. Daisies, too, in such a bowl—the beautiful common field daisy—are exquisite, and half blown roses seem there to have found their natural habitation.

Almost any bowl but a hard white china one is pleasing when filled with flowers. Parsley leaves are particularly effective in a bowl; and even these alone, in sliver or crystal bowls, are quite an effective table decoration. A pot of delicate ferns placed in a bowl, the space between being filled with moss, is very pretty.
